President's Notes

I am hoping by the time you are reading this newsletter we have melting snow, but I am not holding my breath! The weather has kept us out of the Hatchery House for a record number of days. So, let's hope we are on our way to spring.

We are just starting to roll into our year with the Fashion Show the end of March and the Village set to open on April 16th. We always need some help dusting ourselves off and fluffing up for visitors. If you have some spare time on a Wednesday, please stop by to dust or sweep in one of the buildings. That is when the snow melts and we can get to them!

The Village opening brings our school tours and summer brings many visitors and groups that will come through. Part of our mission statement is educating present and future generations. Think about becoming a docent (tour guide) and getting involved with this extremely important facet of who we are.

Also looming on the horizon is Log Cabin Days. Hard to believe this will be number eighteen! Please think about joining us. This is always our biggest time to give back and shine for the community. Attend a meeting or give me a call with an idea or wish to volunteer. WE NEED EVERYONE to make this event a success.

Hope to see you soon,

Sally Strait

The First Settlers in Waterford

An Excerpt from: History of Oakland County, Michigan by Samuel W. Durant Philadelphia: L.H. Everts & Co 1877

The Williams Family Journeys to Waterford

The fall of 1818 witnessed one of the first settlements of Oakland County. In the latter part of September of that year, Major Williams, Calvin Baker, Jacob Eilett, and, it is believed, Colonel Beaufait, together with Mrs. Oliver Williams and Mrs. Alpheus Williams made a journey to Oakland County on horseback. They had a French guide along, who was probably familiar with the country, and followed the Indian trail towards Saginaw, which crossed the Nattawa-seepe (the Clinton river) about where Saginaw street now crosses in the city of Pontiac. The party found the country most beautiful from Royal Oak to the present site of Waterford, and literally alive with all kinds of game, - beast, bird, and fish.

The party selected their lands in the vicinity of Silver lake, searched out the surveyors' lines, and marked the corners. There are three lakes closely connected in this vicinity, called at the present time Loon, Silver and Upper Silver lakes. The Indian name for Loon lake, and it possibly included others, was Nis-so-ga-mong-ne-bing, "place, or lake, of the three loons." The Indian name for lake was ne-bing, and for river or creek se-pee or se-bee.

After an absence of three or four days the party returned, carrying many specimens of the shrubs and flowers of the region. Their report electrified the staid, quiet inhabitants of Detroit, among whom the belief was general that the interior of Michigan was a vast impenetrable and uninhabitable wilderness and morass.

The exploring party entered their lands at the United States land-office, the price being at that time two dollars per acre, only a part of which was required to be paid at the time of purchase.

A Frenchman's Impression of Waterford

An extract from Alexis de Toucqueville's "Fortnight in the Wilderness" is appropriate in this connection, giving as it does a graphic picture of the country as it appeared to the first settlers and those who visited it for pleasure: "After we left Mr. Williams' we pursued our road through the woods. From time to time a little lake (this district is full of them) shines like a white tablecloth under the green branches. The charm of these lonely spots, as yet untenanted by man, and where peace and silence reign undisturbed, can hardly be imagined. I have climbed the wild and solitary passes of the Alps, where nature refuses to obey the hand of man, and displaying all her terrors, fills the mind with an exciting and overwhelming sensation of greatness. The solitude here is equally deep, but the emotions it excites are different. In this flowery wilderness, where, as in Milton's paradise, all seems prepared for the reception of man, the feelings produced are those of tranquil admiration, - a soft melancholy, a vague aversion of civilized life, and a sort of savage instinct, which causes you to regret that soon this enchanting solitude will be no more."

Alexis de Tocqueville
1805-1855

His "A Fortnight in the Wilderness" was written aboard the steamboat "Superior" in August 1831

The Move to Waterford

The succeeding autumn and winter were remarkable warm and open, scarcely any frost or snow being seen until March. Major Williams during the winter built on his land at Silver lake a double log house, fifty by twenty feet in dimensions, one and a half stories in height, and in March, 1819, moved his family from Detroit to their new home in the wilderness.

Overnight at Royal Oak

The journey is graphically described by Mrs. Hodges, a daughter of Major Williams, from whose notes we quote: "In the early part of March, the fifth day, I think, at seven o'clock in the morning, we left Detroit, all snugly packed in two sleighs. There was a light fall of snow, about six inches, perhaps, but there was no frost on the ground. There was not much road, only the Indian trail. We arrived at Royal Oak at sundown, and stayed at Wm. Thurber's overnight. Mr. T. had built a small log house, and lately moved in a family to keep house for him. The lady had several children, but she generously divided her house with my mother and her nine children. There was but one room in the house, and she gave us one side of the fire-place, occupying the other herself. Each soon gathered her flock into her corner. The fire-place was in the old Dutch style, extending entirely across one end of the dwelling. This feature was extremely novel to us all. After a good warm supper, the beds were made on the floor and all camped for the night, but did not sleep much, for we were too full of play, - amusing ourselves looking through the 'chinks' between the logs, counting the stars, watching the moon, and listening to the hooting of owls, the barking of foxes, and the howling of wolves, while every now and then a 'hush, children!' came from our dear, good mother.

We finally passed the night, and at daybreak were astir. A big 'back-log,' ten feet long or more in length and two feet in diameter, was rolled in by two men, and a rousing fire built that heated the whole habitation. After a hearty breakfast the teamsters called out, 'All aboard for Pontiac!' and soon we were snugly packed for another day's journey. The day was bright and warm, the snow melting a little, and we arrived at Dr. Swan's about ten o'clock in the forenoon, near the present village of Birmingham. The doctor had erected a simple 'shanty' and moved his family in a few days before. Here we halted for a few minutes, to chat and exchange compliments, of which I remember nothing, excepting that when we parted from them I saw mother, Mrs. Swan, and Mrs. Dale (her daughter) all in tears. These ladies were real pioneers, and were well known by their repeated kindness to the early settlers of Oakland County.

On to Pontiac

"At noon we arrived at the famous town of Pontiac, situated in the Not-ta-wa-se-be (or crooked river), as the Indians called it. The town then consisted of one little log house, containing three families and a few workmen, who were felling the oak trees for lumber to construct the Pontiac mill, which, I think, was the first flouring-mill in the State, and the first propelled by water-power, all the others being wind-mills.* At this house we took dinner, which was spread on boards laid on barrels. Some sat on rough stools, while others stood up and waited their turn. All was gay and generous hospitality. After dinner we re-embarked and, bidding all a hearty 'good-by!' left the prosperous little town for Silver lake, where we arrived about four o'clock P.M.

The Family Arrives at Silver Lake

"The workmen had occupied a little log shanty while building the house for the family. The latter was in an unfinished state, -the logs were all up and the roof was on and a rough floor laid down, but the gable-ends were not finished, and there was no hearth but the ground. The walls were 'chinked' but not plastered, the material for this last work being clay mortar. This house was quite aristocratic, being fifty feet long and twenty wide, with a ten-foot hall running through the middle. The front door opened to the south and the back door towards the lake. In the hall was a closed staircase leading to a half-story room above, and also down into the cellar, which was thirty feet long and twenty wide. It was walled up with square timbers laid closely together and made very tight, to guard against wild animals and snakes which were everywhere abundant and exceedingly troublesome. Rats were unknown for some years.

* There were mills about Detroit at a very early day, -1753 or earlier, -both water and wind-power.

First Night at Forest Home

"Our first night in our forest-home was a great novelty to us. A field-bed was spread on the loose floor, and a large fire built on the earthen hearth, -which hearth was replaced by one made of clay as soon as the material could be obtained in the spring. Carpets and blankets were nailed up to protect us from the weather, and we were very comfortable, and our good father made us happy by telling us that we had the largest and best house in the country; so we fell asleep talking about the big fire, the big logs of which the house was made, and all the strange things and wonders around us."

The rumbling of the cracking ice upon the lake, as it contracted, alarmed the children until they became accustomed to it, but the greatest scare of all was when the Indians visited the family. They were encamped at various places in the neighborhood, and came to pay their respects to the "Yankees" and become acquainted with the new-comers. They were all introduced and shook hands, and the chief kissed all around.
